From the Editor and Guest Editor
The Land Does Not Belong to Us We Belong to the Land!
Lourdes Torres ................................................... 2
Indigeneity: Local and Global Crossroads
Sylvia Escárciga Zamarrón ............................... 3

De Nuestra América
Discursos Ocultos y Embates con Disfraz: La Resistencia Simbólica del
Yaqui Alrededor de la Rebelión de 1740
Benjamin Alonso Rascón .................................. 6
La Identidad Política Mujeres Indígenas ante los Organismos
Internacionales
Coro J-A Juanena ................................................. 10
¿Eres Indígena?: Oaxacan University Students Define Indigenous
Sara McElmurry ..................................................... 18
More than Ever We Need to Listen: Juchitán Zapotec Experience
According to Blossoms of Fire
Dina Fachin .......................................................... 27
Los Caminos de la Migración Desde la Sierra de Zongolica: Una Aproximación a la Experiencia de los Nahua Veracruzanos y sus
Repercusiones Locales
Luis Alejandro Martínez Canales ........................ 36
Elegguia in La Costa Chica of Guerrero, México: The Persistence of Traditional Indigenous African Spiritual Beliefs in an Afromestizo
Community
Wendy E. Phillips ................................................... 42

Desde el Taller
Acteal: Open Wounds on Indigenous Rights
Marco Tavanti ....................................................... 49
Existential Crisis: Chiapas and Journey to the Deep Ends of the Self
Tomas Ramirez ...................................................... 53
FIoB and CBDIO: La Crisis y la Capacidad de los Indígenas Migrantes
Rufino Domínguez Santos .................................... 55
CBDIO: Gracias a Sus Valores Culturales, los Migrantes Indígenas
Enfrentan Positivamente la Recesión en EUA
Bertha Rodríguez-Santos ................................... 58 Transnational Ties: Weaving Communities Between Guatemala and Chicago
Susan S. Martínez ................................................. 60
Paying Respect: The Cemetery in Xetnox, Guatemala
Hiking to Local Antiquity
Mary Beth Danielson ............................................. 63

Poet's Corner
De Maiz
Marchantita
Tomas Ramirez .................................................... 66
Derecha Izquierda Farandula
Roberto T. Wood .................................................. 68
Madrigal
Jorge Luis Garcia .................................................... 69
En Sus Manos
Andrea Cristancho ................................................ 70

Chispas
Fourth Continental Summit of Indigenous Peoples and Nationalities of Abya Yala
Marc Becker ......................................................... 71
Ucuzoni y las Organizaciones Sociales en la Zona Mixe Baja: Cultura
Política en San Juan Guichicovi, Oaxaca
Yaatsil Guevara González ..................................... 78
El Poder y la Gráfica Popular: El Caso de la Asamblea Popular de los Pueblos de Oaxaca y la Asamblea de Artistas Revolucionarios de Oaxaca
Juan Felipe Guzmán Cuevas and Carlos Piñeyro Nelson .......... 85

Reseñas
Etnográficas e historias de resistencia: Mujeres indígenas, procesos organizativos y nuevas identidades políticas by Rosalva Aida Hernández
Alma Esther Martínez Hernández ........................... 92
Maya Nationalisms and Postcolonial Challenges in Guatemala by Emilio del Valle Escalante
Handbook of Critical and Indigenous Methodologies by Norman K.
Denzin, Yvonna S. Lincoln, and Linda Tuhiwi Smith
Multiculturalism, Interculturality and Diversity in Education. An Anthropological Approach by Gunther Dietz
Sylvia Escárcega Zamarrón .................................. 94

Para Continuar el Diálogo
Community Snapshot: MayaWorks ................................ 97
Call for Papers, Diálogo no.14 ................................. 98
Featured Artist, Miki'ala Catalfano .......................... inside cover
THE LAND DOES NOT BELONG TO US
WE BELONG TO THE LAND!

Indigenous Peoples of the world have a lot to teach us. Diálogo 13 is an invitation to our readers to learn about the Indigenous Peoples and nationalities of Abya Yala (Kuna name for the Americas). The rich compilation of essays and images gathered here offers diverse perspectives on the topic of indigeneity from exceptionally engaging scholars, activists, and artists. Through analytic essays, reports from the field, personal reflections, and striking artwork and photography, this issue offers a sample of the innovative and powerful responses that indigenous people from across the Americas (and their allies) have had to destructive political, economic and environmental policies that continue to wreak havoc on our planet. As I read the essays and viewed the images now before you, I was impressed by the degree to which the multifaceted strategies and approaches of the numerous local and transnational organizing efforts of Indigenous People across the hemisphere are so deeply rooted in an ongoing struggle for self-determination, and an unwavering respect for humanity and the earth. The stories of the historic and present day challenges faced by indigenous men, women and children, both in their homelands and as migrants forced from their lands due to globalization, are awe inspiring but so is the resilience of indigenous populations who respond to these threats through dynamic resistance movements that operate both at the local and transnational levels. The pieces also convey the profound impact that indigenous struggles have on those who behold indigenous ways of life and movements and are inspired to become allies and express their solidarity though a range of academic and/or activist means. The Center for Latino Research is grateful to Sylvia Escárciga Zamarrón for proposing the critically important topic of this issue and for bringing together such an impressive collection of contributors to begin our long overdue diálogo on indigeneity across the Americas.

NOTES
1 From the Lake Titikaka Declaration. See article by Marc Becker.

Contact LOURDES TORRES: ltorres@depaul.edu

About art by MIKI'ALA CATALFANO from 'Pedagogy of Hope', PAULO FREIRE:
Indeed, one of the serious problems of the man or woman in exile is how to wrestle, tooth and nail, with feelings, desire, reason, recall, accumulated knowledge, worldviews, with the tension between a today being lived in a reality on loan and a yesterday, in their content of origin, whose fundamental marks they come here charged with. At bottom, the problem is how to preserve one's identity in the relationship between an indispensable occupation in the new context, and a preoccupation in which the original context has to be reconstituted. How to wrestle with the yearning without allowing it to turn into nostalgia. How to invent new ways of living, and living with others, thereby overcoming or redirecting an understandable tendency on the part of the exiled woman or man always to regard the context of origin (as it cannot be got rid of as a reference, at least not over the long haul) as better than the one on loan. Sometimes it is actually better; not always, however.

MIKI'ALA CATALFANO'S VOICE:
In 1998, I was down on my luck. My immediate family had moved, one by one to California, to Colorado, to Seattle, so I moved to be closer to them. When the drama and the fog of my life lifted a little I became painfully aware that this land in all its beauty was not my home. In great distress I walked in the forest and asked my 'ʻumakua (ancestor gods) if they could hear me here. Despondent, thinking I was now closed off from my 'ʻumakua, I walked back to the car. On my path was a single hawk feather.
As I am writing this editorial, Indigenous Peoples from throughout the Americas are meeting in Quito, Ecuador at the 20th Anniversary of the First Continental Encounter of Indigenous Peoples (June 14-16), under the "Kuntur Anka Pachacutic" (Wind of the Wings of the Eagle and the Condor) of Abya Yala.1 The first encounter happened in the same city in 1990 and its central theme was the "Five Hundred Years of Resistance." In these encounters, Indigenous Peoples have come together to share their stories and journeys, get to know and recognize each other, formulate political strategies and visions for the future, and cement their alliances and relationships. Next week, indigenous women and men, young and adult, the majority from Turtle Island (North America), but also indigenous migrants from throughout the Americas, will be meeting at the second United States Social Forum in Detroit, USA (June 22-26). While in this forum they will undertake the same activities, they also come to engage many other non-indigenous and mixed social movements that form part the worldwide process of "Another World Is Possible." These large encounters and fora are among the many that have happened throughout Abya Yala, where Indigenous Peoples have consolidated a strong internationalized indigenous movement with common agendas, strong networks, and shared visions. In the words of Tupac Enrique Acosta, Yaotachcauh:

These events are the tracks along the path of continuity and follow-through that vindicate and give strength to the process of decolonization of our continent Abya Yala. And although we still have a long distance to travel, the road of encounter, confederation, and alliance at the continental level continues to guide with the illumination of our traditions, the hope of our liberation as Nations of Humanity.2

In fact, since the 1970s, Indigenous Peoples of the Americas began to travel the continent, and to different international arenas, to bring their concerns for the physical and cultural survival of their pueblos, communities, and nations. In so doing, they have actively challenged states, non-governmental organizations, international organizations, the United Nations, and civil society to rethink 500 years of exploitation, oppression, discrimination, ethnocide, and even genocide, and instead build new ways of imagining and living in a different world.

United Nations' official data estimates that there are more than 370 million indigenous peoples and more than 5,000 indigenous groups living in 70-90 countries; they make up about one third of the world's 900 million extremely poor rural people. In Latin America, 50 million Indigenous Peoples represent 11% of the total population. In the 1990s, the indigenous poverty gap in this region grew to be wider than in previous decades (see United Nations 2009). Indigenous activists realized four decades ago that the protection of their rights and redress to which they are entitled, due to historical legacies of colonialism and imperialism, could only be ensured first by influencing international law and policymaking. Indigenous Peoples of the Americas have been instrumental in the creation and consolidation of the Global Indigenous Movement, which today has a very strong voice in the United Nations and among some social movements transnational networks. They participated actively in the drafting and adoption process of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples (adopted on September 13, 2007), a document of great historical consequences. Yet, the attainment of political, cultural, social, and economic recognition and justice are still unresolved issues at the national and local levels. There is thus still a long road ahead of us, especially as the UNDRIP begins to be implemented in partnership with Indigenous Peoples. I firmly believe that academia has the moral and political responsibility to accompany this process in solidarity.

This issue of Diálogo, "Indigeneity: Local and Global Crossroads," is in honor and recognition of the histories, struggles, and contributions of Indigenous Peoples from the Americas. It is a recognition of their suffering, resistance, strength, and solidarity that are at the heart of who they are and what they are proposing nowadays as solutions for our current crises. As the name of the journal suggests, this issue has been conceived as another voice in the intercultural dialogue that has to happen, and is happening, between all of those who have dedicated their lives to the protection of human rights and the attainment of justice in the context of an ever-changing pluricultural world. For this reason, my intention was to bring together the voices of indigenous and non-indigenous activists, artists, and academics interested in sharing their experiences and knowledges in a journal committed to the divulgación de saberes. Several crucial themes appear throughout this issue of Diálogo: the empowerment of indigenous women, the experiences of indigenous migrants and their communities, indigenous resistance throughout history and in contemporary times, what it means to be indigenous, indigenous modes of representation and knowledge, indigenous organizing, and academia's engagement with indigenous issues. Let me give you a preview of what is in each section.

De Nuestra América section contains essays that employ different analytical perspectives to understand indigeneity, indigenous resistance, Indigenous migration, and Afromestizo religion. Most of the essays are based on the premise that Indigenous Peoples are agents being able to represent themselves using their own voices. Benjamin Alonso Rascón uses a historical perspective to understand the various forms of symbolic Yaqui resistance in the 18th century. He concludes the essay alluding briefly to how Yaqui resistance is guarded in collective memory and can come out in daily interactions. Coro J-A Juanena explores how indigenous women have weaved a political global identity and how they are representing themselves to international organizations. She tells us that indigenous women have built a new social collective that has transcended a "consciencia en sí" to formulate a "consciencia para sí," from which they can propose decolonization strategies. Based on the responses of indigenous university students, Sara McElmurry explores how they interpret what is and what it means to be indigenous in Oaxaca. She concludes that indigeneity is relational and that it is often associated strongly with discrimination and injustice. Dina Fachin analyzes how the collaborative work between a Zapotec community and video makers in the film Blossoms of Fire results in a deconstruction of mainstream stereotypical images of indigeneity, and in presenting them as "enunciators of their own histories." Using social class as an important factor, the essay by Alejandro Martínez Canales focuses on the effects of migration on the Nahuá culture in the Sierra de Zongolica, Veracruz, Mexico. Finally, Wendy Phillips explores how afromestizo communities in La Costa Chica in Guerrero, Mexico have been able to retain some elements of indigenous African religious systems as a form of resistance. As does the first essay in this set, she suggests that this is because these elements remain in the "collective unconscious" or in the memory of afromestizos and they can surface when appropriate.

Desde el Taller brings together various short pieces based on the personal experiences of indigenous and non-indigenous activists, students, and academics, in their encounter with indigenous and transnational realities. Marco Tavanti and Tomás Ramírez talk about their experiences in Chiapas, Mexico. The first is a committed scholar who has been following the processes at Acteal, a Maya-Tzotzil community that witnessed a massacre in 1997. Given that in 2009 several of the convicted murderers were freed by the Mexican justice system, he claims that "Acteal is an open wound in the Latin American and worldwide indigenous quest for justice," for this reason, Acteal has been memorialized and linked to other pillars of shame. Tomás Ramírez shares with us his personal experiences in San Cristóbal de las Casas, which have had a powerful effect on him as he reflects upon the reality he was immersed in through an academic program; and he discusses how to help change that reality by creating awareness. He says: "The liberation of indigenous women in San Cristóbal de las Casas is the liberation of all women," as he realizes that if this is to happen, it would mean that a change in our consciousness would also have happened.

The next two essays capture the experiences of indigenous migrants in constructing a sense of collective self through close economic, social, political, and cultural relationships in a transnational space that encompasses the communities of origin as well as all of those where indigenous migrants have settled. Rufino Domínguez-Santos narrates how the Frente Indígena de Organizaciones Binacionales was established in California in 1991 and how it has worked to defend and promote the rights of indigenous migrants in both Mexico and the USA. He also explains that the Centro Nacional para el Desarrollo Indígena Oaxaqueno was created to promote programs and capacity building for the benefit of indigenous communities. Domínguez-Santos explains that developing a cultural consciousness is key for learning from other cultures and to respect each other. Bertha Rodríguez-Santos explains some of those rooted values that indigenous migrants bring with them, and how they organize among themselves to navigate US society and state institutions.

The last two essays reflect on how working collaboratively with indigenous women and their communities has transformed the authors personally. Susana Martínez tells us about her experiences in reconnecting with one of her places of origin, Guatemala, especially as an academic. She tells us about how, upon her return to Chicago, these experiences inspired her to set up a reading group as a space for dialogue, and to collaborate with MayaWorks, a non-profit fair trade organization. Mary Beth Danielson reflects on how she discovers a sense of community in an unexpected place for her: the town cemetery in Xetoxo, Guatemala; and how she perceives the Maya as being "rooted" peoples as she visits a mountain with her family host.

Chispas section brings together three very detailed and descriptive essays on indigenous organizing at different levels. Beginning with the international level, Marc Becker writes about the Fourth Continental Summit of Indigenous Peoples and Nationalities of Abya Yala that took place in Puno, Peru, in 2009 just before the massacre in Bagua. This summit's slogan "For plurinational states and living well!" reflects the commitment of the internationalized indigenous movement in the Americas to make proposals for the survival of all humanity. Yaa'til Guevara González, in contrast, focuses on indigenous organizing at the local level in the region called Mixe Baja in Oaxaca. She describes how a new political culture has emerged in the region that has promoted the corstitution of indigenous organizations and the incorporation of political parties. Juan Felipe Guzmán and Carlos Piñeyro Nelson describe the formation of two important social movements in the volatile context of 2006 in Mexico: the Asamblea Popular de los Pueblos de Oaxaca and the Asamblea de Artistas Revolucionarios de Oaxaca; and the kinds of alternatives that they propose.
Although neither of these are indigenous organizations, indigenous activists have certainly participated consistently in both of them in different ways.

The book reviews should speak for themselves, but I want to acknowledge the generosity of Alma Esther Hernández Martínez in reviewing a very important book on the experiences of indigenous women in Mexico, Colombia and Guatemala by Rosalva Aída Hernández. My contribution is a review of three books that are challenging us to understand in different ways indigenous social movements, indigeneity, and interculturality in the context for decolonization. I offer my sincere appreciation of Gunther Dietz and Emilio del Valle Escalante who allowed me to share a small part of their fascinating journey of exploration of these issues; and to the editors of the Handbook of Critical and Indigenous Methodologies for an incredibly insightful volume on critical pedagogies, ethics, and indigenous discourses.

Our featured artist, Miki’ala Catafano is a Native Hawaiian living in California where she participates actively in bringing awareness on indigenous cultural diversity and in promoting their rights at the local, national, and international levels. We are very honored to present her art from the series “Cultural Identity” in this issue of Diálogo, as it brings together many of the important themes discussed here. Through her work and that of others, she reflects on what it means to be indigenous living in two worlds, the loss of Hawaiian sovereignty, living in exile, and what it means to be an indigenous woman. She invites us all to think about our relationships with our ancestors, our lands, Mother Earth, and those places we call “home,” as well as on the stereotypes and romanticization of Native Hawaiians.

With her powerful lesson, and everything else that I have learned from Miki’ala in our international journeys, as well as from my joint paths with other contributors in this issue, I would like to finish this introduction; but not before giving my most profound gratitude to all of them, to all of you who wish to embark in this amazing dialogue with us, and to the Center for Latino Research for inviting me to make it possible.

NOTES
1 The Kuna name for the Americas. The Kuna live within Panamá.
2 See http://www.cumbrecontinentalindigena.org/nahuacalli06_en.php (accessed June 16, 2010).

REFERENCE

Contact SYLVIA ESCÁRCEGA ZAMARRÓN: secarce@depaul.edu

About art by MIKI’ALA CATALFANO: A long time ago, before I believed it, I asked a tree when I would be able to go home. “You are home,” the tree told me. Sometimes when I am on the land, I feel the rightness of being. In that way, I am always connected to my home, Hawai’i.

FROM THE GUEST EDITOR
FOURTH CONTINENTAL SUMMIT
OF INDIGENOUS PEOPLES AND NATIONALITIES OF ABYA YALA

Marc Becker
Truman State University

More than six thousand Indigenous delegates from 22 countries across the Americas gathered on the shores of Lake Titikaka at the heart of the Andean world in the Peruvian highland city of Puno during the last week of May 2009 for the Fourth Continental Summit of Indigenous Peoples and Nationalities of Abya Yala.

The summit concluded with the reading of the Lake Titikaka Declaration that condemned western capitalism for the current economic and environmental crises that is leading to the death of the planet. The delegates called for an alternative of life based on the principles and practices of Indigenous peoples that emphasize equilibrium and diversity.

The 2009 Puno summit built on a series of meetings that have led to a strong and unified continental Indigenous movement. The first summit was held in Teotihuacan, Mexico in 2000, followed by meetings in Quito, Ecuador in 2004 and Iximche’, Guatemala in 2007. These summits built on a longer organizational process that includes the First Encounter of Southern Cone Indian Organizations in Ollantaytambo, Peru in 1980, and the First Continental Conference on Five Hundred Years of Indigenous Resistance held in Quito, Ecuador in 1990.

The call for the summit emphasized that Indigenous peoples had organized and convened the meeting themselves and on their own terms in order to build Indigenous unity across the Americas.

At the 2007 Guatemalan gathering, Argentine delegates proposed holding the Fourth Summit of Indigenous Peoples and Nationalities on the Chilean side of the triple Peru/Bolivia/Chile border. Although such a spot was politically significant, the logistical demands of bringing thousands of people to a remote location proved to be too daunting. The Guatemalan summit had left a local organizing committee in charge of arranging the specific details, and they decided a better site would be the tourist city of Puno. This location provided both an abundance of hotel rooms, a conveniently located airport, and the support of the municipal government. Holding the meeting in Peru also proved to be a politically astute choice given the presence of a growing and increasingly powerful Indigenous movement in that country. Although not a direct outcome of the summit, an Indigenous strike in the Peruvian Amazon leading to a massacre the week after the summit further turned the world’s attention to Peru, placing it directly in the midst of debates concerning environmental issues, the crisis of the capitalist system, and the collapse of western civilization.

Leading up to the Puno summit, organizers held preparatory meetings in Mexico, Chile, Peru, and Ecuador. These meetings were designed to prepare delegates for the Puno summit, and to frame out topics of discussion for the main meeting. All of these factors contributed to a very successful gathering. As organizers noted, the process of building the summit “came from the bottom up,” from locating a site, defining the agenda, and mobilizing participation.

So many people flooded to the meeting that organizers announced that they were cutting off individual registrations; only groups could subsequently register delegates. Considering that the previous summits had been postponed, it was quite a nod to successful organizing strategies that the fourth summit largely came off largely as planned.

The lead organizers for the event were the Coordinating Body of Andean Indigenous Organizations (CAOI) and its Peruvian member the National Coordinating Committee of Communities Affected by Mining (CONACAMI). Local organizers also formed a Communal Council of Quechus and Aymaras for this purpose. The summit was held at the National Altiplano University (UNA). In welcoming delegates to Puno, university rector Martha Tapia Infantes emphasized how appropriate it was to have the Indigenous gathering on the campus because of its mission to address many of the same issues in rural communities that the summit was engaging.

The slogan of the third Indigenous summit in Guatemala was “from resistance to power,” reflecting social movement attempts to engage electoral politics. The election of Evo Morales to the presidency of Bolivia had brought the issue of electoral participation to the forefront, and triggered hopeful optimism for additional Indigenous electoral gains elsewhere across the Americas. Two primary topics of discussion in Guatemala were the formation of plurinational states and embracing the Quechua concept of sumak kawsay, of living well, not just living better. Since the 2007 Guatemalan summit, both of these concepts have made their way into the Bolivian and Ecuadorian constitutions. The invitation to the 2009 summit stated that “we have already passed from resistance to power, we have demonstrated that we have proposals for the survival of all humanity.” As a result, the slogan of the Puno summit became “For pluralist states and living well!” These twin concepts underscored and informed discussions, emerging repeatedly throughout the summit.

INDIGENOUS WOMEN’S SUMMIT

Indigenous communities have long been proud of their egalitarian and horizontal nature that includes gender duality or complementarity which theoretically is supposed to open up spaces for both men and women. From this perspective, patriarchy and machismo are often depicted as western values that are foreign to Indigenous communities and cosmologies. Nevertheless and despite a long history of strong female leadership, the Indigenous summits have traditionally been overwhelmingly male spaces with women often relegated to marginal or token roles.

Recognizing ongoing problems of gender inequalities in Indigenous organizing efforts, at the 2007 Guatemalan summit women decided to organize their own summit to discuss their concerns. As a result, the Puno summit opened with over two thousand Indigenous women gathering in a two-day First Continental Summit of Indigenous Women. Their stated objective was to create a space for women to meet and develop a plan to defend their rights with an eye toward unity, equality, and reciprocity. Although framed as a women’s summit, topics of conversation extended well beyond narrowly defined Indigenous women’s or gender issues. The slogans for the summit included opposition to free trade agreements and war, and an embrace of life, self-determination, plurinationalism, and living well. Although under these rubrics the topics of conversation ranged broadly, it did remain very much a women’s summit in the sense that it was almost entirely organized and led by Indigenous women.

The summit started on the morning of May 27 with a march from the (appropriately selected) women’s plaza to the university where the summit was held. It was a small march, but at the university several other (and larger) marches joined it. Several (male) spiritual leaders led a religious ceremony on the university grounds. The summit then opened with three panels that set the agenda and tone for the meeting. The first panel was on Cosmology and Identity: Model of Development, with presentations by Juana Bartzibil from Waqik’b’ej (Guatemala), Rucilda Nunta Guimaraes from AIDESEP (Peru), and Nancy Chila from CONAMAQ (Bolivia). Sonia Henriquez, a Kuna from Panama moderated the panel. The main themes were solidarity and reciprocity.

The second panel was on the Rights of Women: Violence and Racism. The presenters were Maria Miquelina from COHAB (Brazil) and Aida Quilcue from ONIC (Colombia). Cecilia Velazquez from CONAIE (Ecuador) moderated the panel. A key theme in this session was the importance of both Indigenous peoples and women in the construction of a plurinational state. This was the only panel with a male presenter. CAOI leader Miguel Palacín and the lead organizer for the summit, joined the panel to give a male perspective on these issues. He emphasized the standard Andean themes of gender equilibrium, with the importance of participation of both men and women in the building a sustainable society.

The third panel was on Women in the Construction of Power and Democracy, with presentations from Vicenta Chuma from ECUARUNARI (Ecuador), Amparo Gutiérrez from REMUI (Mexico), and Leonilda Zurita from Bartolina Sisa (Bolivia). Blanca Chancosa from ECUARUNARI (Ecuador) moderated. The presenters emphasized the importance of looking at power and democracy from the perspective of women, and the need for solidarity to achieve these goals.

After these opening panels, delegates broke into 16 different workshops ranging through topics such as leadership, organization, identity, communication, territory, migration, biodiversity, and violence. Those workshops then gathered into six thematic sessions to draft proposals for a final plenary session. The six sessions were on cosmology and identity; collective rights; the construction of power and democracy; alternative development models; violence and discrimination; and communication. Each of these sessions reported its key demands back to the general assembly.

Much of the concrete work and specific suggestions in the summit emerged out of these workshops and thematic sessions. The session on identity called for a reconstitution of the cosmology of Indigenous peoples and nationalities in order to maintain their spirituality and culture. Furthermore, they demanded that Indigenous cosmologies not be folklorized or commercialized. Instead, they requested respect for sacred sites and recognition of the political, social, cultural, and economic knowledge of their ancestral authorities. The delegates also called for an end to machismo and racism, advocated that these should be replaced instead with Indigenous values of complementarity, duality, equilibrium, respect, and harmony. Both on a personal and political level, they pointed to a need to move from empty discourse to concrete practices.

The workshop on collective rights argued that Indigenous communities should use international agreements and declarations to defend their rights. Women, as the providers of life, should learn how to use these tools in their own struggles. They should not remain passive in the implementation of public policies, particularly in the face of those that destroy the environment and other forms of life. In particular, they pointed to the International Labor Organization (ILO) Convention 169 and the United Nations Universal Declaration of the Rights of Indigenous Peoples as key documents to advance their struggles. In order to make the most effective use of these platforms, they needed to strengthen the political formation of Indigenous women. In this process, they should retain their fundamental values of transparency, honor, honesty, and truth.

The session on alternative development models proposed examining the impact of globalization on Indigenous communities from a women’s perspective. Many of the topics related to territory, migration, biodiversity, and food sovereignty, however, echoed themes of broader concern to Indigenous communities. Delegates pointed to the need to recover traditional lands from large estates, and implement alternative development models that would favor Indigenous peoples. They called on governments to help create dignified jobs and repeal neoliberal policies that created the need for people to immigrate in the first place. Water should be treated as something essential for life and not as an economic commodity. They pointed to ancestral cosmologies as a way to combat climatic changes. In terms of food sovereignty, they called for small scale organic production with farmers marketing their own crops without the need for intermediaries who often soaked up all of the profits.

To combat violence and discrimination, delegates called for guarantees of equal access to decent jobs. Bilingual education also promised to diminish problems of racism and discrimination. The women also called for reparations for victims of armed conflicts, as well as for those injured by transnational corporations. Finally, the women called for a prohibition on the sale of war toys that they blamed for creating a culture of violence. This last mention of toys was one of the few points in the statement that appeared to be uniquely a result of female sensibilities on this issue.

A final session on communication proposed a collective and sustainable system that maintained its independence from government structures. Instead, grassroots organizations should develop strategies to use communication networks to advance a political agenda. In particular, delegates called for women to learn how to use new technologies. This was important in order to create an equitable, equal, and complementary communication network.

After two days of meetings, the women’s forum closed with a marathon 4-hour long plenary session. Blanca Chancosoco, the moderator, said that men were free to participate, but that women should be allowed to speak first. In reality, this was an entirely women-run event. It was not until the very end when Bolivian women kept insisting that a defense of coca needed to be included in the final statement (and Chancosoco kept insisting that it was already there) that a man stood up to defend the ancient value of the sacred leaf that the Padres Inkas (delegates shouted “and Madre Inkas too”) gave to us. Some of the women delegates thought that it was so inappropriate that this man had inserted himself into their discussions that they took him outside and told him they were going to teach him a lesson. In a joking fashion, they hoisted him up on their shoulders and paraded him around the university grounds. Unmistakably, women were in charge of this scene.

FOURTH SUMMIT

The main summit began on May 29 with an early morning ritual ceremony in Puno’s central plaza (Plaza de Armas). After the ceremony and breakfast, delegates left on a march that wound its way through the streets of the city and down to the Lake Titicaca waterfront. An outdoor stage held the inaugural session of the summit, followed by 2 panels on the crisis of capitalism and plurinationalism. After the inaugural activities, delegates continued on to the university for 60 different breakout sessions. As with the women’s summit, these sessions were then combined into 10 panels with each of those presenting their results to a final plenary session at the end of the summit.

Some observers were concerned that women’s issues were not among those listed as topics of discussion at the Indigenous summit. Launching the activities with the women’s meeting, however, effectively influenced subsequent discussions in the main summit. Women had a much more visible and active presence in presentations and discussions than in previous events. That is not to say that complete gender equality was achieved, but it was an important step in the right direction.

With both Ecuador and Bolivia having recently approved new constitutions that recognize the rights of Indigenous nationalities, plurinationalism became a key theme at this summit. Humberto Cholango, the president of ECUARUNARI, the movement of highland Kichwas in Ecuador, is a strong advocate of plurinationalism. He argued that “one can’t say that a plurinational state is only for Indigenous peoples, or only for us with the goal of isolating others.” Rather, he contended that “a plurinational state has to include Indigenous peoples, Blacks, poor people, marginalized social sectors, workers who have been victims of the neoliberal model.” He advocated that a key agenda item coming out of the forum should be that Indigenous activists should advocate for the inclusion of plurinationalism in the constitutions of other countries where it does not already exist.

The theme of plurinationalism as an inclusionary ideology was echoed repeatedly throughout the summit in many different ways. Cecilia Velázquez from the Confederation of Indigenous Nationalities of Ecuador (CONAIE) added that “we can’t speak of constructing plurinational states without the participation of Indigenous women. At the World Social Forum in Brazil they said that another world is possible with the participation of Indigenous peoples. We also say that that the construction of plurinational states is only possible with the presence of Indigenous women.” The concept of plurinationalism continues to spread to other areas, especially Guatemala and Peru that also have large Indigenous populations. As an example of this spreading influence, CONACAMI president Mario Palacios and one of the lead organizers of the Puno summit is involved in the creation of a new political party, called “Perú Plurinacional.”

In addition to the theme of plurinationalism, the summit also emphasized the Quechua concept of sumak kawsay, of living well, not just living better. Indigenous activists have embraced this concept as an alternative to government or corporate ideas of development often based on extractive enterprises such as petroleum or gold mining. They challenged western models that sought to define a good life as one based on high levels of consumption, leading to over exploiting natural resources that triggered an environmental crisis with a disproportionate impact on Indigenous peoples. “Development should be in harmony with Mother Earth, with nature, not destroy it,” Palacios said. “We have to overcome the irrational use of resources and respect the rights of Indigenous peoples.” In an editorial, CAOI proposed “using nature, but without damaging it.” Indigenous delegates imagined alternative models that placed the needs and concerns of people and future generations ahead of that of corporate profits or the interests of a national security state.

Under these twin themes of plurinationalism and living well, delegates debated a wide range of issues. These included opposition to the privatization of natural resources, extractive enterprises, and the criminalization of social movements. Panels also focused on issues such as food sovereignty, climatic justice, and migration. Peruvian sociologist Anibal Quijano who has long worked with Indigenous movements said that he believed “that this meeting is the most important political act in Latin America this year. It is important not only for Indigenous peoples, but also for the rest of humanity. It calls into question the role of capital in its worst moment as it threatens the survival of the planet.” As Quijano notes, Indigenous communities have emerged at the forefront of struggles for a better future.

LAKE TITIKAKA DECLARATION

The summit ended with a massive plenary session that presented the findings of different groups that met during the week and featured the reading of the summit’s concluding document, the Lake Titikaka Declaration. Many of the specifics and much of the language of this declaration was similar to that of previous documents. A theme throughout these Indigenous gatherings, particularly those with a significant Bolivian presence, is a call for the decriminalization of the coca leaf. Indigenous declarations have long called for solidarity with the Cuban revolution, and this one called for Israel to leave Palestinian territories. Most notably, the Lake Titikaka Declaration added that the world was suffering through a deep crisis of western civilization. This crisis was exhibited in environmental and financial collapses that was destroying the planet. It offered an alternative of life based on the twin principles of plurinationalism and living well. The declaration also advocated the creation of an international climate justice tribunal to prosecute corporations and governments who damage the environment.

To achieve these goals of protecting the planet, the summit pledged to engage in a global mobilization in defense of mother earth beginning on the symbolically important date of October 12, 2009. The dominant culture traditionally celebrated the anniversary of Christopher Columbus’ arrival in the Americas as the day of hispanidad (Spanishness) or the mestizo race, but after protests against the 1992 quincentenniel of Columbus’ voyage, Indigenous organizations have converted it into a day of resistance against exploitation, exclusion, and ethnocide. The summit called for massive protests on this day against a capitalist system that is destroying the planet through the commercialization of life, pollution of the environment, and criminalization of social struggles. Proposed actions were to include protests in front of the United Nations and multinational corporations involved in extractive enterprises, discussion forums on how to defend the mother earth, tribunals on climate justice, and assemblies to articulate strategies to bring to the conference on the Kyoto Protocol planned for Copenhagen in December 2009. These actions were to culminate on October 16 in a day of action for food sovereignty organized by the Landless Workers Movement (MST) in Brazil and the international small farmers group Via Campesina, significantly bridging the Indigenous and peasant wings of international rural peoples movements.

On a related topic, the Lake Titikaka Declaration reiterated a call for a Global Forum on the Crisis of Western Civilization, Decolonization, Living Well, and Alternative Paradigms that was originally proposed at the 2009 World Social Forum in Belem. Planned for Cuzco, Peru for March 26-28, 2010, the purpose of the forum was to deepen an analysis of the crisis of western capitalist civilization as expressed through the multiple food, energy, financial, environmental, cultural and other concurrent crises. An objective was to decolonize power and knowledge and organize spaces of action and reflection in the construction of positive alternatives. Similar to the October 12 mobilizations, in addition to Indigenous peoples this forum was to include the participation of broader social movements. Whereas previous Indigenous statements often emphasized broad general statements, a focus on specific programs and actions characterized the Lake Titikaka Declaration. Increasingly significant initiatives and concrete alternatives emerged out of these international Indigenous gatherings.

The concluding political declaration of the youth forum followed along similar ideological lines of the Indigenous and women’s summits, but perhaps more of a culturalist twist. Plurinational states, their declaration began, “means recognizing diverse cultural identities” that “includes a communitarian democracy in which education, health, spirituality, language, and communal relations are horizontal.” The statement strongly criticized a repressive capitalist system as racist, for criminalizing social struggles, and for “suffocating our peoples and nations.” Capitalism imposes systems of acculturation, assimilation, and folklorization, all of which “weaken our cultural values.” Capitalism oppresses people, leading to migration and sexual exploitation. Furthermore, a “neoliberal and neocolonial capitalist system imposes an educational system that is not adequate for our cosmology.” Instead, they called for an integral educational system that “feeds our system as well as our intellect.” Such a system would embrace “our ancestral ways of communicating knowledge of our cosmology.” Similarly, an Indigenous health care system would seek to preserve the cosmocimientos or knowledge of cosmologies of their ancestors.

Unlike the Indigenous or women’s summits, the youth discourse was underscored with repeated references to the acknowledgement, respect, and reconstruction of the “ancestral millenarian cosmologies inherited from our grandfathers and grandmothers.” The youth summit closed with a call to create schools to train Indigenous youth with the political, ideological, and technical skills.
necessary to carry on their struggle to achieve their social, political, economic, and spiritual vision. They promised to engage in information campaigns about the destruction that the capitalist system was causing to the "equilibrium and harmony between human beings and the Pachamama." Whereas the Lake Titikaka Declaration proposed concrete actions to bring an end to the damaging effects of neoliberal capitalism, the youth statement preserved a tone more common to earlier proclamations.

MILITARIZATION OF SOCIAL SPACES

One of the increasingly pressing themes in these Indigenous summits is the militarization of civil society. The Guatemalan summit had a heavy policy presence, allegedly justified by the high crime rate in that country. The Puno summit was also surrounded by police, but without the accompanying justification of problems of criminal violence. Even though organizers had made the security arrangements with local authorities, it left many delegates feeling as if they were under constant political surveillance. For example, the opening women's march was followed by a large police contingent, with at least as many cops as marchers. Police also positioned themselves outside of the university gates along with a large riot control vehicle. As this was an entirely peaceful gathering, this large police presence was hardly justified. Interestingly, the national police only used Indigenous women and men dressed in community policing uniforms to help provide security inside the university.

A related theme at the summit was the criminalization of social movements. Governments from across the region contract with multinational petroleum interests and other extractive industries, and then prosecute Indigenous peoples who take actions in opposition to those neoliberal policies. "They criminalize us when we want to protect Mother Nature," said CONACAMI president Mario Palacios who has a long history of leading struggles against mining corporations in Peru that destroy local communities. Delegates observed that previously they faced oppression from the countries' armed forces, but now their livelihoods are threatened by transnational corporations. The degree of assault and collusion with government officials led Tupac Enrique Acosta of the Izkaltotan Pueblo to observe that "these aren't governments; they're accomplices." This astute observation rings particularly true for rural communities in Peru that have faced persecution from the government of Alan Garcia for opposing the extractive policies of mining corporations.

An important theme at social forums is a solidarity economy, with local vendors efficiently providing nutritious and inexpensive food for the delegates. In Guatemala, organizers contracted with local communities to cook a basic campesino diet of rice and beans, which worked very well. Apparently since many local communities around Puno are reliant on the tourist trade for their survival they were hesitant to give that up in support of the summit. Instead, organizers contracted a commercial vendor who provided a standard but bland Andean diet of rice, potatoes, and chicken in styrofoam containers. The result was long lines, frequent shortages, and trash littered across the university grounds.

AMAZON

The Puno summit was quickly overshadowed by the massacre of dozens of Indigenous protesters, the wounding of hundreds more, and the disappearance of others in the Peruvian Amazon in the week after the continental gathering. The conflict had been building since April 9 when activists organized a strike against Garcia's government over its attempts to usurp its territorial and proprietary rights. On June 5, the government used overwhelming force to break up a roadblock by Bagua in the northeastern Amazon. Protesters counterattacked, killing several police officers in the process. The confrontation brought an end to a 57-day protest that until that point had been largely peaceful, but the massacre also forced the Peruvian government to roll back its plans to open up the Amazon to transnational mining industries.

Condemnation of Garcia's government had been a common theme at the Puno summit, both because of his aggressive support for neoliberal economic policies and free trade agreements, but also because of his policy of granting political asylum to conservative opposition leaders such as Manuel Rosales from Venezuela and three former Bolivian ministers who were facing prosecution for the deaths of protesters during the October 2003 "gas war." Evo Morales had planned to address the Indigenous summit, but stayed home so as to avoid provoking an international incident. The summit's final declaration stated that the Amazonian "struggle is our struggle," and called for strikes in front of Peruvian embassies during the first week of June. Neighboring leftist presidents Hugo Chávez from Venezuela and Rafael Correa from Ecuador had also been invited to the summit, but neither attended. Both presidents have faced intense criticism from Indigenous communities in their respective countries for their extractive policies, with Indigenous organizations in Ecuador declaring Correa persona non grata when he showed up at the 2009 World Social Forum in Belem, Brazil to champion his version of twenty-first century socialism.

In the context of these growing tensions, Alberto Pizango, leader of the Interethnic Association for the Development of the Peruvian Jungle (AIDESEP) traveled to Puno to address the summit's closing plenary session on May 31. Delegates warmly greeted Pizango with wild cheers and applause for his leadership of the Amazonian struggle. Upon return to Peru, Pizango faced criminal charges for leading the protests and subsequently sought asylum in the Nicaraguan embassy.

More broadly, however, what was striking about the Puno summit was largely the absence of Amazonian peoples, both from Peru as well as from the broader Amazonian basin. Surprisingly, the Confederation of Indigenous Nationalities of the Ecuadorian Amazon (CONFENIAE) scheduled its congress for precisely the same days as the summit. Marlon Santi, the current president of CONAIE, historically one of the most important Indigenous organizations in the Americas, is from the Ecuadorian Amazon, and attended the CONFENIAE congress instead of coming to Puno summit.

On paper, the Coordinating Body of Indigenous Organization of the Amazonian Basin (COICA) was one of the lead organizations, together with CAOI and the Central America Indigenous Council (CICA). But this was overwhelmingly a Tawantinsuyu (the old Inka Empire) summit, and some would say even a Qollasuyu summit, the part of the Inka empire that stretched south from its capital at Cuzco into current-day Bolivia. Rainbow colored Andean wipala flags decorating the entire site. The Andean languages of Quechua and Aymara were commonly heard both in public discourses and in casual conversation. Inka nationalists called for a return to Tawantinsuyu. Social forums always take on the flavor of the local environment, and these Indigenous summits are no exception. The Guatemalan summit was largely a Maya affair, and perhaps it was to be expected that the Puno meeting would be an Andean summit.

While the continental Indigenous organizing process grows and gains strength, tensions and divisions within the movement become increasingly apparent. The Andean–Amazonian divisions were already apparent at the World Social Forum in Belém, Brazil, in January 2009. Meeting at the mouth of the mighty Amazon river, the Belém forum had the largest participation of Amazonian Indigenous peoples of any of the social forums. The Belém forum began with a “Pan-Amazonian Day” with a focus on climate change, food sovereignty, and regional integration. In the Indigenous tent where sessions focused on the environment, territory, and development, however, this unified front collapsed into disagreements over who should control the discussions. In a big show, Amazonian delegates left the tent and presented their own declaration to the closing assembly, separate from that of the CAOI delegates who remained behind.10

Indigenous mobilizations against the 1992 quincentennial celebrations also broke down into two clearly defined wings, with one pole focused around Nobel Peace Prize winner Rigoberta Menchú who advocated building strategic alliances with leftist political movements, and a dissenting group who wanted to maintain a clear focus on their identities as Indigenous peoples.11 The current sequence of summits emerges out of this second “ethnicist” group with its focus on Indigenous cosmologies and identity politics, but it has also assumed many of the sensibilities of the populares in terms of its eagerness to build alliances with other social movements and engage in overt leftist discourse that includes a sustained criticism of capitalism. Some outspoken participants at the Puno forum criticized the Catholic Church and marxist political parties as the twin enemies of Indigenous peoples, but this anti-modernist discourse hardly represented the primary line of thought at the summit. Rather than moving backwards to a pre-capitalist past, most participants would favor instead moving forward to a better and more humane socialist future.

The current divisions within international Indigenous movements are much more complicated than those that emerged at the time of the quincentennial protests, with some leaders more willing to exploit apparent advantages in allying with current governments in power or working with the United Nations to gain a significant public stage for their concerns. Another group, largely lead by the Zapatista rebels in Chiapas, Mexico, represents an anarchist wing of the movement and is much more suspicious of government players, seeing the state as the problem rather than providing solutions. Some Zapatistas have allied with the Wayuu people in Venezuela who criticize president Hugo Chávez’s state-centered development models (and in the process come dangerously close to allying with the conservative anti-Chávez opposition that wants to reimplement an individualistic neoliberal capitalist economic model). The growth of evangelical christianity in Indigenous communities has also led to a significant conservative movement that is largely unwilling to engage in oppositional politics.

Within the wing of an international Indigenous movement that is organizing this series of summits, even the idea of who is included in the concept of Abya Yala becomes narrowed with colonial boundaries increasingly defining the scope of organizational strategies. In the anti-quincentennial movements and particularly in the 1990 Quito conference, participants often talked about the meeting of the northern eagle with the southern condor. Groups such as the South and Meso American Indian Rights Center (SAIIC) explicitly sought to build pan-hemispheric unity from the Arctic to Tierra del Fuego. Increasingly, however, when these summits present themselves as “continental” many delegates appear to construct that as the “Latin American” continent, or even the Spanish-American area of colonization. (Interestingly, in one article CAOI made a passing reference to “building our organizations from Alaska to Patagonia” in the struggle against a dying neoliberal capitalism, so the hemispheric language and concept has not entirely disappeared. 12) Despite attempts to build a regional integration with Abya Yala North, Mohawk and Shoshone delegates from Canada and the United States were greeted as visitors similar to Indigenous Masai, Sami, Kurdish, Catalan, and Basque representatives rather than as an integral part of the conversations. Only a scattering of Indigenous peoples from Brazil attended, and together with only a handful from the U.S. and Canada, this reality left Spanish as the overwhelmingly de-facto lingua franca of the summit.

Perhaps part of the increasingly narrow geographic focus in the Abya Yala forums is due to a growing focus on the creation of a plurinational state. This proposal is currently only a realistic and viable option in Andean countries or in Guatemala where a large and well organized Indigenous movement can press the issue. Countries such as Chile which have a long history of Indigenous struggles also have similar aspirations. In contrast, small and disperse Indigenous populations in countries such as Paraguay and Honduras, much less the United States or Canada, can hope to have a similarly dramatic influence on government structures. The result, then, is a growing and coherent albeit somewhat more narrowly focused international Indigenous movement.

MOVING FORWARD

A final topic of discussion at international gatherings is where to hold the next one (and after four sequential successful meetings, whether to hold another one was hardly even raised). The summit had a large and well-organized Bolivian presence, partially because Puno is located right on the Bolivian border, but also because Bolivia has exceptionally well-organized social movements. At the women’s summit, it almost was a forgone conclusion to hold the next meeting in Bolivia in 2011. With that decision in place, the general summit and youth encounter decided to follow suit and also hold their next meetings at the same time. That decision further underscores the significant and growing influence of Qollasuyu in defining the agenda and direction of continental Indigenous organizing efforts.

The Indigenous summit, as well as the youth and women’s meetings, talked about creating a continent-wide organizational structure to carry forward the work of the summits. The call for the Puno meeting underscored that advancing a continental organizational structure was a primary goal and purpose of the gathering. Similar to statements in Guatemala two years earlier, the Lake Titikaka Declaration called for the formation of a Coordinating Body of the Indigenous Peoples and Nationalities of Abya Yala to advance Indigenous struggles, monitor international bodies such as the Organization of American States (OAS) and the United Nations, and to form an Indigenous United Nations. The women similarly proposed a Continental Coordinating Body of Indigenous Women of Abya Yala that would represent Indigenous women in international settings. The purpose of their coordinating body would be to defend the mother earth, strengthen their organizations, make proposals, and create spaces for sharing economic, political, social, and cultural experiences. The youth followed by also calling for the formation of a Continental Coordinating Body of the Indigenous Youth of the Peoples and Nations of Abyá Yala. With COICA in place in the Amazon, CAOI emerging as a strong organization in the Andes over the past three years, and the creation of CICA in Central America, some leaders noted that the missing regional pieces were a southern cone organization and one representing North America. Plans on both of those fronts are slowly advancing. It remains to be seen whether activists are able to solidify plans for such a hemispheric organization, or whether conflicting interests would tear it apart. In the meantime, creating a new continental organization remains a topic of conversation and interest.

Tupac Enrique Acosta who has long participated in these transnational meetings commented that “there are ebbs and flows in the process of the continental Indigenous movements. The summits are highlights, high points, you could say, in the process.” The summit provided a good and energetic meeting, with perhaps some of the best discussions happening outside of the sessions as part of the informal networking and conversations that happen at these types of events. Despite some hiccups and complications, the process of building a strong trans-national Indigenous movement is going well.

NOTES
1 Abyá Yala is the term the Kuna people of Panama use to describe the Americas. Indigenous activists have increasingly embraced it as an alternative to Euro-centric language.
10 The two statements are available as the Declaration of Indigenous Peoples, http://www.nativeweb.org/papers/statements/state/caoiws
Diálogo invites work from scholars/activists/teachers that explores poverty and inequality in Latin America, as well as on poverty and inequality among Latin@s in the U.S. and Canada.

Diálogo is seeking essays, scholarly articles, artwork, poetry, testimonials, and book reviews from diverse disciplines that reflect on a variety of topics and explore the changes, extent, causes, or effects of poverty and inequality in Latin America, and among Latin@s in the U.S. and Canada.

POSSIBLE TOPICS INCLUDE, BUT ARE NOT LIMITED TO:

- Agrarian and Rural Issues
- Children and Youth Cultures
- Citizenship, Rights, and Social Justice
- Cross-Border Studies and Migration
- Development and Regional Alternatives
- Economics and Development
- Histories and Historiographies
- International Relations
- Feminist, Gender, Sexualities, and LGBTQ Studies
- Religion and Spirituality
- Violence and (in)security
- Law, Jurisprudence, and Society
- Mass Media and Popular Culture
- Political Institutions and Processes
- Biodiversity, National Resources, and Environmental Policies
- Urban Planning, Infrastructure, and Social Services
- Civil Society and Social Movements
- Culture, Power, and Political Subjectivities
- Health, Medicine, and Body Politics
- Education, Pedagogy, and Scholarly Resources
- Human Rights and Memory
- Labor Studies and Class Relations
- Latin American Diasporas and Latin@s in North America
- Transnationalism and Globalization
- Politics and Public Policy
- Linguistic Pluralism, and Language Policies
- Literature, Poverty, and Culture

Diálogo is a bilingual journal of the Center for Latino Research at DePaul University. It has a national outlook and a Midwest regional focus. It publishes scholarly articles, essays, interviews, and creative work concerning U.S. Latino communities in the U.S., and Latin American affairs. It publishes the work of scholars, community leaders, organizers, artist, and students. Based in the Midwest, Diálogo hopes to serve as a bridge between the larger Latino communities in the Eastern, Western, and Southern United States. We strive to highlight the diversity of the Latino communities throughout the country, and the impact of the growing Latino immigration on the United States.

Diálogo invites and will consider all forms of expression: Academic and non-academic articles, essays, interviews, research reports and works of creative fiction.

- Written work must not exceed 20 typed, double spaced pages.
- There are no minimum page requirements.
- The maximum length for book and film reviews is 6 pages.
- For citation and documentation MLA or APA style must be used; endnotes are preferred.
- Work submitted must be in WORD format.
- Submit visual image/s to accompany your work - highly suggested - but we do not guarantee inclusion of visual images
- Photo or art essays (with text) must not exceed 15 images or 15 pages.
- All visual images must be clearly identified with a short description and credit.
- All images must be in JPEG or TIFF format in 400 dpi.
- All work must be submitted on a CD and via email.
- Your CD must include: contact information including mailing address, e-mail address, and a biography of no more than 150 words

For general questions and further guidelines, please contact Managing Editor, MARÍA ISABEL OCHOA at mochoa@depaul.edu or (773) 325-7317. For questions concerning the theme of the issue, please contact Guest Editor, JOSÉ SOLTERO at jsoltero@depaul.edu.

1. Please submit a self-addressed envelope along with your work to:
   Center for Latino Research @ Diálogo magazine
   DePaul University / 2320 N. Kenmore Avenue, SAC 5-A Chicago, Illinois 60614-3250

2. And in electronic form to Managing Editor at:
   mochoa@depaul.edu

Note: Images (photography, slides and artwork) will be kept for up to three months from the date of publication. After the three-month period, they will be returned to the contributor.

SUBMISSION DEADLINE: November 1, 2010
MIKI'ALA CATALFANO
FEATURED ARTIST

"I am riding in the feathers of my Tutu wahine and behind the eyes of my Tutu wahine nui. I fly on their backs above and below the earth. We wear kīhei of feathers and dance around the fire. They don't always say things I understand, but I listen. "What am I supposed to do?" I ask them. "Tell our story," they reply.

"For American Indians, the problem of identity comprehends centuries of colonial and postcolonial displacement, often brutally enforced peripherality, cultural denigration - including especially a harsh privileging of English over tribal languages - and systematic oppression by the monocentric 'westering' impulse in America."
Other Destinies: Understanding the American Indian Novel, Louis Owens

ARTIST'S VOICE
I was raised in a "westernized" home. I'm thankful I had hula to help me know who I am as a Hawaiian. I trace my Hawaiian genealogy to the islands of Maui and Hawai'i island (Moku o Keawe). This undeniable relationship is my birthright and my joyous burden to bear as I do my best to walk in two worlds.

"The parts of Indian cultures that have been lost, and those we are constantly losing, are equally as valuable as the land that was taken. Those of us who choose to live in two worlds are doing what we can to keep the fires of our ancestral knowledge burning. Though a difficult task, we will not let these fires be extinguished. We often look to traditional teachings in order to make sense of a world that is seemingly going off center. Today, American Indian blood courses through the veins of many races, many cultures, and in many unknown places, yet we remind ourselves to remember who we are, where we come from, and rely heavily on spiritual advice to guide us on our paths. We hold fast to what we know, try to teach our children to respect and understand ancestral values, only to constantly realize that so much of what it means to be American Indian has been lost or misrepresented, and we are often misunderstood. Still we go forward, adding newfound embers now and then to the olden fires that have existed since time immemorial.

Determined to honor those who have gone before, realizing the trivializations they endured, we ardently face the daily trials required to live in two worlds: the traditional and the modern."
Goncaco de the Mind, introduction by editor Marilo Moore

ARTIST'S VOICE
I dreamed about my kupuna kane (grandfather), and I saw him standing in an empty village. Everyone was gone. A census report shows that by the time he was 14, he was living with his widowed aunt, the only living relative we know of. He was only nine at the time of the illegal overthrow of the Hawaiian Monarchy. During his lifetime only one person out of every twenty-five survived the diseases introduced by foreigners. Some estimates say 960,000 Native Hawaiian people died in a period of 100 years, leaving only 40,000 Native Hawaiians by the time of annexation in 1893.

ABOUT THE ARTIST
MIKI'ALA CATALFANO is Hawaiian, now living in Redding, California. She is co-director of the Native Arts Cultural Collective, a grassroots organization dedicated to supporting indigenous peoples and cultural diversity through the arts, a member of the Advocates for the Protection of Sacred Sites, another grassroots organization dedicated to protecting sacred sites, land, plants and animals, board member of the Local Indians for Education (LIFE Center) and a supporter of various Native cultural endeavors in the northstate California region and as well as back home in Hawai'i. She is a painter, writer and traditional hula dancer who continues to learn more about her culture with the express purpose of preserving and perpetuating all things Hawaiian.

CONTACT: mikala.catalfano@gmail.com
IMAGES MAY NOT BE REPRODUCED. Artist available for commissioned work.